

Submissions and evidence to the COVID-19 Response Inquiry

13/12/2023

Hi,

My name is [REDACTED]; I am a family man, and I am [REDACTED] years old. I live in [REDACTED]. I resided in Melbourne during the COVID-19 pandemic. I wanted to take this opportunity given to me here to express my thoughts on this tragedy that has affected us.

During the pandemic, between 2020 and 2022, I was a student studying from home, and my wife worked in the early childhood sector. I can say that I consider myself fortunate because I was only minimally impacted by the government measures against COVID, except for the lockdowns and curfews that affected us all, preventing us from going out for fresh air and exercise as we would have liked, which would have been beneficial for our health.

However, my wife faced a difficult choice between being laid off or accepting the COVID-19 vaccine. As she knew that these vaccines were still in the experimental phase, she sought advice from her general practitioner. Since her doctor refused to commit to the safety and effectiveness of the vaccine, my wife bravely declined to get vaccinated and was subsequently terminated.

This decision led to a series of challenging events on a personal, family, and financial level. But what justifies behaving like a laboratory guinea pig when informed and voluntary consent is not provided? My wife made the right choice. She is convinced, and so am I because:

- We now know that the measures taken at the time were counterproductive in terms of health: lockdowns do more harm than good and do not prevent the spread of the virus. Instead, they contribute to domestic violence, depression, and family estrangement with disastrous emotional consequences
- Masks have not been proven effective. In fact, numerous studies show that they are ineffective in preventing the transmission of the SARS-CoV-2 virus
- We also know that vaccines are not effective because they do not prevent the transmission of the virus, contrary to what was initially claimed
- We know that vaccines are not safe; manufacturers have since admitted to serious side effects, including myocarditis and pericarditis, despite earlier denials during a massive media campaign

Moreover:

- In countries with widespread COVID vaccination campaigns, there has been an average increase of 15% in mortality since the vaccination campaign. Strangely, no link is considered between this abnormal excess mortality and the vaccination campaign. Why? Why this silence around this abnormal excess mortality, and why such a lack of action to investigate the causes? Why settle for labeling these deaths as "unknown cause"? Does this topic not interest anyone?

For all these reasons, and others that would be too lengthy and tedious to explain here, I judge the government's actions during this pandemic as having been (and still being, as the consequences for some individuals are still felt today and for the rest of their lives) deleterious in nature. The government imposed measures harmful to our health and showed a thirst for control over our lives that exceeded the sole concern of protecting us and prevented us from living normally, as free and responsible individuals for ourselves and our community.

I sincerely hope that no government will ever have to answer for actions as harmful to the well-being of its population again.

sincerely,
