

I was a [REDACTED] during 2020 and 2021 when the covid measures took place. I was fired in early 2022 as I had refused to get any vaccination after witnessing several people, including a close family member, end up in hospital after suffering a severe reaction.

I was fired and treated appealingly due to government mandates which were based off no scientific evidence. The students [REDACTED] [REDACTED] suffered trauma through lockdowns only to have [REDACTED] trying to comfort them upon their return. It has since come to light that the vaccines don't prevent you from getting covid, nor do they stop transmission. The government should never have been able to mandate a vaccine.

Secondly, a whole range of other procedures were put in place without any scientific backing (mask mandates, curfews, ect). The government and health officials need to be honest with the community and explain that it could help. It should never be mandated when you have no proof that it works.

Basically the government overstepped with all there measures and handling of covid. A full royal commission needs to take place and apologise/compensation need to be give to those who suffered (the injured and unvaccinated)
